When 01-27400022-1745617-psp1004 approached me with the idea for this book I was - “naturally” - quite skeptical. As a “recognized expert” in my field I failed to identify, or should I say, I had no category at my immediate disposal to classify the work. I possessed no criteria (or should I say no criteria possessed me) for measuring its “weight of contribution” to my field (except maybe in kilograms), but it was not printed on paper, and 01-27400022-1745617-psp1004 informed me that it/she/he had no intention at all to kill trees just to make the creative pattern of this work visible as a molecular artifact.

Although I had trouble at first with the idea that a cat could transform into a dog and back again – while flying through the air – it did at least make sense that there was a game afoot here. Hakeysacker is a well known and well respected game among university dropouts. It is probably the primary cause of most poor attendance at university lectures throughout the world.

One should ask critically “what on earth possesses the students” that would cause them to be so fascinated with perpetual motion and engaging their bodies in learning a skill rather than attending a well prepared lecture by a notable professor, professing to know a lot about certain well established ‘truth’ claims, limited by an ever narrowing perspective on the human condition. But I digress.

What is at stake here is clearly whether a human being could act as the extension of mobile technology. Can we accept the possibility that, what was formerly at our bidding, now knocks at our door and commands us to perform certain unmentionable acts. What I mean is; does it make sense to act as the personal assistant to a technologically advantaged member of our society formerly disadvantaged and known as a “PDA” or “Mobile-Device”. Of course it makes sense in 2045; but now? I am writing in 2007. How would I justify this state of affairs to the audience.

“I confess that it leaves me with a certain sense of intellectual discomfort.” (Bertrand Russel).
